

MINES PONTS 1

THÈME

[...] Étrangement, la loi HB 1467 n'interdisait pas de publier les livres bannis, ni à proprement parler de les lire. Il était simplement défendu aux libraires de les vendre et aux bibliothécaires de les proposer. Le législateur avait trouvé le moyen de ne pas appeler « censure » ce qui en était pourtant une. Quand Mitch avait entendu parler pour la première fois du projet de loi HB 1467, il avait d'abord cru à une farce, un artifice de campagne électorale. Impossible qu'un texte aussi abscons ait été pensé par un seul homme. Il avait fallu l'intervention de plusieurs cerveaux détraqués pour imaginer quelque chose d'aussi résolument machiavélique. Un paradoxe, alors que le gouvernement qui en revendiquait la paternité prétendait vouloir appliquer la volonté de Dieu et rendre à la morale tous ses droits. En apparence, cette loi avait pour seul objet de bannir des livres préjudiciables à la cohésion sociale, mais plus Mitch en étudiait les articles et plus il comprenait que ses auteurs mûrissaient d'en faire avec le temps la clé de voûte d'un changement profond et durable. [...]

EXPRESSION

- 1) Why does the Trump administration want to dismantle DEI? Answer the question in your own words. (80 words, ± 10 %).
- 2) In your opinion, is America going backwards in terms of civil rights? Illustrate your answer with relevant examples. (180 words, ± 10 %).

TRUMP IS ON THE WRONG SIDE OF HISTORY BY DESIGN

The New York Times, February 12, 2025 (abridged)

The genius of the right-wing crusade against “diversity, equity and inclusion” is that the term is amorphous enough that it can mean many different things to many different people.

To a certain set of well-meaning cultural liberals, D.E.I. refers mainly to H.R. mandates and ineffectual diversity training. If those people work in progressive nonprofits or any other space that attracts young, left-leaning people, D.E.I. might also mean the aggravating use of clumsy acronyms like “BIPOC” or linguistic inventions like “Latinx.”

For people of a more moderate or conservative persuasion, D.E.I. might mean affirmative action and the elevation of unqualified people to sensitive and high-status positions. (Although how one knows they are unqualified is often left unsaid.) It might also mean public adherence to liberal shibboleths about diversity — “virtue signaling” by “woke elites” in academia and the corporate world.

There is also a related (and not altogether incorrect) view from the political left that D.E.I. is just a smoke screen for capital and its servants — a multicultural gloss on the neoliberal agendas of the managerial classes, whether corporate bean counters or university administrators.

The upshot of the many meanings of D.E.I. is that when President Trump announced, at the start of his term, that he wanted to uproot D.E.I. from the federal government, there was some sympathy — and even agreement — from those who are otherwise opposed to the administration and its overall program. If nothing else, effectively ending the battle over D.E.I. might clear the space for a different kind of politics, less focused on diversity and inclusion than more material concerns.

But then we have to remember that D.E.I. also means something to people on the political right, from the reactionaries who lead the White House to the propagandists who carry their message to the masses. For them, D.E.I. is less “white fragility” and silly posters about “white supremacy culture” than it is the mere presence of a woman or nonwhite person or disabled or transgender person in any high-skilled, high-status position. And their alternative isn't some heretofore unknown standard of merit; it is the reintroduction of something like segregation.

Consider the ways the administration has tried to carry out the president's executive encyclical against D.E.I., which called for federal agencies to "relentlessly combat private sector discrimination" and "faithfully" advance "the Constitution's promise of colorblind equality before the law."

At the National Security Agency, it has meant an effort to purge all N.S.A. websites and internal networks of banned words such as diversity, diverse, inclusive, racism and racial identity. Over at the Department of Defense, led by Pete Hegseth, a former Fox News host, it has meant the end of official recognition of Black History Month, the disbanding of affinity groups at service academies and a move to curb military outreach to Black professionals in engineering and the sciences. Diversity, Hegseth says, is "not our strength." At the National Institutes of Health, displays honoring women and scientists of color have been removed, and at the National Science Foundation, program officers have reportedly been directed to reject grant applications that mention anything related to diversity, equity, inclusion or accessibility.

There's more. In addition to purging the Department of Justice of anything that smacks of D.E.I., Attorney General Pam Bondi has instructed the agency to target private-sector diversity programs for potential "criminal investigation." A company that wants to increase its proportion of female employees or place more Black Americans in corporate leadership may find itself in the cross hairs of the federal government. [...]

MINES PONTS 2

THÈME

Ils avancent au rythme des maracas, tambours et chants traditionnels : les représentants des peuples autochtones brésiliens se sont mélangés à plusieurs milliers de militants de tous les pays, samedi 15 novembre, lors d'une vaste marche à Belem (Brésil).

Objectif : faire pression sur les négociateurs participant à la conférence mondiale sur le climat (COP30), qui se tient jusqu'au 21 novembre dans cette ville amazonienne, pour qu'ils aboutissent à des résultats concrets dans la lutte contre le réchauffement. Une première depuis trois ans, alors que les manifestations étaient interdites dans les centres-villes de Bakou (Azerbaïdjan), Dubaï (Emirats arabes unis) et Charm el-Cheikh (Egypte), où ont eu lieu les précédentes conférences (...)

Mardi 11 et vendredi 14 novembre, des manifestants ont forcé et bloqué l'entrée du site de la COP. Ils ont obtenu une rencontre avec des responsables brésiliens, dont le président de la conférence André Correa do Lago, pour évoquer leurs revendications.

Ces messages envoyés par les manifestants parviendront-ils jusqu'au palais des congrès de l'Amazonie, qui n'est accessible qu'aux délégations officielles ?

Le Monde, 15 novembre 2025 (adapté)

Indigenous People Reflect on the Meaning of Their Participation in COP30 Climate Talks

By Associated Press, Nov. 22, 2025

Indigenous people filled the streets, paddled the waterways and protested at the heart of the venue to make their voices heard during the United Nations climate talks that were supposed to give them a voice like never before at the annual conference.

As the talks, called COP30, concluded Saturday in Belem, Brazil, Indigenous people reflected on what the conference meant to them and whether they were heard.

Brazilian leaders had high hopes that the summit, taking place in the Amazon, would empower the people who inhabit the land and protect the biodiversity of the world's largest rainforest, which helps stave off climate change as its trees absorb carbon pollution that heats the planet.

Many Indigenous people who attended the talks felt strengthened by the solidarity with tribes from other countries and some appreciated small wins in the final outcome. But for many, the talks fell short on representation, ambition and true action on climate issues affecting Indigenous people. "This was a COP where we were visible but not empowered," said Thalia Yarina Cachimuel, a Kichwa-Otavalo member of A Wisdom Keepers Delegation, a group of Indigenous people from around the world.

The first paragraph of the main political text acknowledges "the rights of Indigenous Peoples, as well as their land rights and traditional knowledge." But Mindahi Bastida, an Otomí-Toltec member of A Wisdom Keepers Delegation, said countries should have pushed harder for agreements on how to phase out fuels like oil, gas and coal "and not to see nature as merchandise, but to see it as sacred."

Several nations pushed for a road map to curtail use of fossil fuels, which when burned release greenhouse gases that warm the planet. Saturday's final decision left out any mention of fossil fuels, leaving many countries disappointed.

Brazil also launched a financial mechanism that countries could donate to, which was supposed to help incentivize nations with lots of forest to keep those ecosystems intact.

Although the initiative received monetary pledges from a few countries, the project and the idea of creating a market for carbon are false solutions that "don't stop pollution, they just move it around," said Jacob Johns, a Wisdom Keeper of the Akimel O'otham and Hopi nations. "They hand corporations a license to keep drilling, keep burning, keep destroying, so long as they can point to an offset written on paper. It's the same colonial logic dressed up as climate policy," Johns said.

From the beginning of the conference, some Indigenous attendees were concerned visibility isn't the same as true power. At the end, that sentiment lingered. "What we have seen at this COP is a focus on symbolic presence rather than enabling the full and effective participation of Indigenous Peoples," Sara Olsvig, chair of the Inuit Circumpolar Council, wrote in a message after the conference concluded.

- 3) According to the article, to what extent did the COP 30 outcome match indigenous people's expectations? Answer the question in your own words. (80 words, ± 10 %).
- 4) In your opinion, who should lead the way in climate-change action? Illustrate your answer with relevant examples. (180 words, ± 10 %).

SUJET PROPOSÉ PAR MME TESTEMALE